Publishes Technical Report on Archeological Site Stabilization Information Sources

National Park Service (NPS) Director James M. Ridenour has announced the issuance of the report Site Stabilization Information Sources. The report, also called Technical Brief No. 12, is the latest in a series of technical information reports that the NPS Archeological Assistance Division publishes.

Archaeologists and cultural managers currently responsible for the protection of archeological sites and the management of the cultural resources within these sites have to work within a legislative framework that favors minimal impact to the site and the resources.

Technical Brief No. 12 highlights the process of a stabilization project, which is a multi-discipline effort between the archeologist and/or the cultural resources manager in charge of the project and the stabilization specialists whose techniques may be needed.

Archeologists and/or cultural resources managers are encouraged to become familiar with the different site stabilization techniques. Sources of technical information from various government agencies and private organizations are described; contact addresses and telephone numbers are listed.

Technical Brief No. 12 is available free of charge by writing to: Publication Specialist, U.S. Department of the Interior, National Park Service, Archeological Assistance Division, P.O. Box 37127, Washington, DC 20013-7127.

Publishes a Selection of Articles About Educational Programs in Archeology

In keeping with the goal of Secretary of the Interior Manuel Lujan, Jr. to increase public education as one of the aspects of a national strategy for Federal archeology, the National Park Service has released a booklet: Archeology and Education: The Classroom and Beyond.

The booklet includes six essays by different educators and professionals in the field of archeology who discuss programs that successfully impart the awareness, the teaching of, participation in, and evaluation and training of teaching in archeology.

Redressing the necessity for archeologists to impart the value of their discipline to a wider audience, Archeology and Education: The Classroom and Beyond is written for the general public. Educators are an important audience, and the essays demonstrate how educators, by including archeology in their curricula, can successfully teach students about their past.

Archeology and Education: The Classroom and Beyond is part of a series entitled Archeological Assistance Studies that the NPS Archeological Assistance Program publishes. The publication is free and is available from Publication Specialist, Departmental Consulting Archeologist/Archeological Assistance Division, P.O. Box 37127 (436), Washington, DC 20013-7127.

Editors Note

Over the last year, a number of factors have combined to insure extended delays in the production of the NCAS Newsletter and the journal Southern Indian Studies. We apologize for this yet are happy to say that in the coming month we will actually be caught up. Furthermore, in upcoming newsletters we promise to provide news of ongoing research across the state, as well as more information on future directions of the NCAS. Your patience is appreciated.
